Friday, April 11, 2019 - 15:06 Origin myths are like creeds for people of the same faith. Each faith has its own creation myth; that is why we find Hindu, Christian and Muslim creation myths, but also have Jewish and Muslim, which have their own versions of the creation story. Author: Prakash Khandelwal It's the origin of the human species in the Indian Subcontinent, touted by all as the cradle of civilization, that is at the heart of the much debated debate on if Indians are Indians. The deliberate attempts to eliminate the 'Aryans' from the Indian history, claimed by some as a fact, is what prompted

Chopra's book "Indian Reality: A New Look at History, Society and Culture of the Ancient World." He argues that sub-continental civilizations were totally different from that of the Persians and the Greeks, and each had its own civilization. This was completely different from the Aryan theory. The latter claimed that the Aryans were the founder of the Indus Valley civilization. "While for the Persians, Greeks and Romans the Aryan civilization was the first, for India, it was the Indus Valley civilization," said Chopra. These claims were used by Adolf Hitler to build up a case for the Aryan theory, arguing that Aryans were more civilized than the other nations and deserved special rights. He mentions how Alexander the Great took special care to learn about India and its culture because of this theory and also visited the then Indian capital of Alexandria in the year 323 BC, where he was shown the ruins of the Indus Valley civilization. "The Greeks at that time considered India one of the major civilizations in the world but it was a recent idea and the Aryan theory was not born until the German philosopher Goethe in 17
